Brass Threepenny Bits (1937-1967): Made of brass (an alloy of copper and zinc) These had the distinctive 12-sided (dodecagonal) shape Introduced in 1937 and ran alongside the silver ones until 1945 Much thicker and more practical than the silver versions Featured a thrift plant (Armeria maritima) on the reverse The brass threepenny bit was particularly memorable for many people because of its unusual 12-sided shape, which made it instantly recognizable by touch. It was commonly used in Christmas puddings as the traditional "lucky coin" and was withdrawn from circulation in 1971 when the UK switched to decimal currency.

ID <input type="text" value="0359"/> Label <input type="text" value="F01-11"/> Notes	South Lancashire Prince of Wales Volunteers favour In Lancashire (and other parts of Northern England), a "favour" is a ribbon or rosette worn as a decorative adornment, often to show support for something or someone. This usage is most commonly seen in: Political contexts: Colored ribbons or rosettes worn during elections to show party allegiance (red for Labour, blue for Conservative, etc.) Sports contexts: Ribbons or badges worn to support local football teams or at sporting events Social occasions: Decorative ribbons worn at weddings, celebrations, or community events Sometimes worn by wedding guests or at local festivities The term comes from the older English meaning of "favour" as a token of goodwill or support, which evolved into these physical ribbon decorations. It's a lovely example of how regional dialects preserve older English meanings that have fallen out of common use elsewhere. This usage of "favour" for ribbon adornments is quite traditional in Lancashire and reflects the area's strong community traditions around showing allegiance or celebration through clothing accessories. Notes

A cod bottle (also called a Codd-neck bottle) is a type of glass bottle invented by British soft drink maker Hiram Codd in 1872, designed to store carbonated beverages.

Its distinctive feature is a marble inside the neck of the bottle. When the bottle is filled with a fizzy drink, the pressure of the carbonation pushes the marble up against a rubber seal at the top, keeping the bottle airtight. To open it, you press the marble down into a pinched chamber in the neck, which releases the seal and lets you drink.

They were widely used for lemonade and other fizzy drinks in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, particularly in Britain and parts of Asia (they're still used for a Japanese drink called Ramune today).

Kids famously used to smash the bottles to retrieve the marble inside, which made the bottles somewhat short-lived! This is also thought to be the origin of the slang term "codswallop" — though that etymology is disputed.

ID	0612	Sawtooth setter	Q Tools
Label	Q05-28
Notes

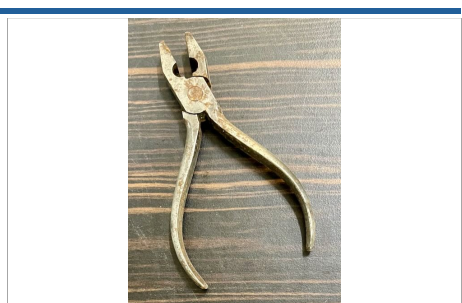

A sawtooth setter is a specialized tool used to sharpen and set the teeth on saw blades, particularly for hand saws like crosscut saws and rip saws.

Here's what it does:
 Setting the teeth means bending alternating teeth slightly to the left and right of the blade's plane. This creates a cut (kerf) that's wider than the blade thickness, which prevents the saw from binding in the wood as you cut.

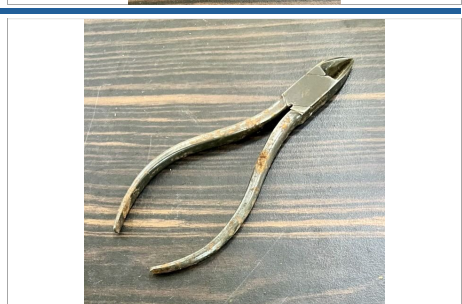

Key features:
 It's essentially a plier-like tool with an adjustable anvil that controls how much each tooth is bent
 The amount of "set" can usually be adjusted - more set for softwoods (wider kerf), less for hardwoods
 It ensures consistent bending across all teeth, which is crucial for smooth, straight cutting

Why it matters:
 Without proper set, a saw blade would bind and stick in the cut. Too much set makes the saw hard to push and creates a rough cut. Too little set causes binding. The sawtooth setter helps maintain that precise balance. These tools were essential in traditional woodworking and are still used today by people who maintain vintage hand saws or work with traditional woodworking tools. Modern versions exist, though many woodworkers now use disposable hardpoint saws that can't be resharpened.

Item description from the seller A rare and beautiful Gothic-style oak reading desk (ambon/lectern) complete with matching stool, originally from Rainford Parish Church, 1923. Features: 133 cm / 78 cm / 30cm <ul style="list-style-type: none"> * Solid oak construction with rich patina and natural ageing. * Traditional Gothic carved design with strong presence. * Sloped reading surface, perfect for books, Bibles, or display. * Comes with original step * Historical provenance - Rainford Parish Church (1923). This is a used antique piece with visible damage and wear in several places - all clearly shown in the photos. Structurally solid and sturdy, but sold as seen. Memories: Eileen Robinson (nee Carter) born 1949 attended the school. Lectern always at top of stairs with bible on it. Used to be decorated with garlands of straw for Harvest Festival. (NB school was on first floor due to existing water table.)

Notes Rainford Bog Oak Large pieces of bog oak are still being dug up by Rainford farmers. The oak comes from a time 2,000 to 6,000 years ago when there was an oak forest at the rear of Inglenook Farm on the Rainford By-pass. Trees fell into the bog and became preserved because they were waterlogged and starved of oxygen and sunlight. Bog oak is usually black but the colour varies and may depend on chemicals in the peat and the depth it is lying in the ground. In conclusion it is possible that some of our Rainford Bog Oak could date back to 4,000 BC in the Neolithic period.
